Composer of surprise symphony

Franz Josef Haydn served as Kapellmeister or Court Composer, for the Prince Nikolaus I sterish for 28 years at the moment the prince died in 1790. Successor Nikolaus', his son Anton, was not a big fan of music and largely dissolved from the musical creation family. Haydn moved to Vienna and quickly received many jobs offering, the most exciting from which came from the violinist-Johann Peter Salomon, who offered Haydn a considerable sum of money to come to England to present several New compositions in a concert séci. Haydn arrived in England (his first trip outside of the USTria) on January 1, 1791, and the first of three seasons of Salomon's great success concerts began in March. Symphony No. 94 was debuted under Haydn's direction on March 23, 1792, in the middle of the second season. The symphony opens with tenderness, with a gently swinging genial theme, main that constructs a good steam head, since it is developed. As is the case with so much frequency with Haydn, the recapitulation of the opening themes is actually more than an extension of its development. There is a pleasant passage to the blows just before the end of the movement. It drifts the Symphony nickname of the just famous second movement, which is a set of variations on a little sweet melody, ingenerated. As the melody turns out, he becomes calmer and quieter, dying of almost silence - and then there is a hide aloud voice of all the orchestra. There are several theories regarding why Haydn inserted that "surprise" (which was actually a late reflection, and does not appear in his original manuscript). An account tells us that Haydn may have said: "This will make the ladies jump!" He may also have been the thought of the elderly gentlemen he saw in his audiences that, packed by his heavy â € à € à €
