Everyone loves a trusted contact list as a centralized repository of information, especially in the smartphone age. Although this list seems to grow randomly (some people regularly "check" their contact list), we tend to keep in touch with the same handful of people. Here's a simple idea for a "favorites" list, is coming, a fast and useful Android contact manager tool that separates the most used contacts from the rest. Stay tuned after the break for a very quick tutorial on Google Contacts and how to "favorite" people. Android has gone from a general contacts app to a People app for managing your contacts, and while the name may have changed, the framework has largely remained the same. The People app combines multiple accounts and moves contact information from each into a central management area. Marking a contact as a favorite is easy, just click on the contact's name and select the star icon at the top of the contact's tab. You'll then be able to see this combination of your favorite contacts and people you interact with frequently in the Favorites tab of the People app. A useful part of this People app is the ability to sync your favorites across devices using your Google account. . Be sure to sync your Google Contacts to your phone, and maybe even consider using Google Contacts as a centralized database for easier backups and device syncing. This way, any changes you make to contacts or favorites on one device are also carried over to other devices that are connected to your Google Account. If you have a phone that has replaced the Google app, the process is pretty much the same. . Be sure to use your Google account as your primary contact sync and mark the contacts you want to favorite. Even if you don't use the official People app, your contacts will sync with Google the same way. Some of these apps may try to sync with another service or your phone's built-in storage, so be sure to double-check your sync location to avoid data loss. We understand that many of you are already familiar with the complexities of syncing and tagging your contacts, so this may remind you to "check" your unnecessarily growing contact list. Better yet, send this guide to someone who knows less about Android. Everyone likes to have a solid person list as a central information store, especially in the age of smartphones. Although this list seems to be randomly grow and expanding (very few people control their lists regularly), we tend to communicate with the same handful of people over and over again. This is the place where the idea of a simple "Favorites" list comes into play. Usually there is a fast and useful Android person manager tool that distinguishes people you communicate with others. After the break, wait for a very short lesson on Google people and faces labeled as "your favorite". Android has moved to people from shared people, but the names may have changed. The system is basically the same. People are associated with multiple calculations, so the contact information of each account is in a single central government. Mark a recipient as a simple favorite, click the name of the person, and then select the "Star" icon at the top of the person's card. Then, you can see a combination of these frequently used people and the people you frequently attach. A useful part of these people is the ability to synchronize your favorite devices with your Google account. ; Make sure that you sync with your phone with your phone, or even consider using Google people as your central database to make it easier to back up and synchronize your devices. In this way, changes in individuals or frequently used devices are transferred to other devices connected to the Google account. If you have a phone that changes the Google application, the process is almost the same. Make sure you use a Google account as your basic person synchronization system and mark the people you want as a favorite. Even if you do not use the official persons app, your people are synchronized with Google. Some of these programs may try to equalize with another service or by the default internal storage of your phone. Therefore, check where you have synced to prevent data loss. We understand that many of you have already consumed people with the timing and complexity of your favorite prominent prominent, so this can remind you of this "review" of your growing person list. Better, publish this tutorial for those who are less familiar with Android. They can safely support their contacts: you can be one of these favorite contacts in the future. Ah, I think he will have to find something else in the game store. There is a free program called "Widget of favorite people" that does this job. I also talked to the creator and I said that he would soon publish the update, which would include an integration of the Facebook image. I use it to put it on the main screen. These include "contact", "direct dial" and "direct message". When you drag the controller to the main screen, call the dialog box. 2013-05-06 03:53 03:53 I Take the SIC423. Take teniscica42ttics.
